About the House of Representatives

The House of Representatives has some defining characteristics. They are:

- The House of Representatives is one of two houses in the Australian federal Parliament.
- The House of Representatives is the people's house because in it the people of Australia are directly represented in electorates of roughly equal population.
- The House of Representatives is the chamber where government is formed. The party (or coalition of parties) with a majority of members forms the government with the leader becoming the Prime Minister. The government stays in office as long as it retains the majority of members.
- Community and media interest in the work of the House of Representatives is great.

What does the House of Representatives look like?

The House of Representatives bears the following distinctive characteristics:

Colour: Green is the traditional colour used in the British House of Commons. The Australian House of Representatives maintains this tradition while calling to mind the soft greens of the Australian eucalypt landscape.

Shape: The U-shaped seating arrangement is characteristic of Australian chambers. The U-shape encourages participation and debate, since all members can see and hear each other clearly.

Size: The current House of Representatives seats 150 members, including several unfilled seats that are in excess of present needs. Australia's Parliament House has been built with the expectation of serving Australia for 200 years. Thus, as the population of Australia grows and more members are elected, an additional row of seats may be added to the existing chamber.

Galleries: Members of the public are invited to view the chamber in session and are seated in public galleries that seat up to 536 people. The press, who occupy half of the second floor of Parliament House, enjoy a prime view of the chamber from above and behind the Speaker. In addition there are two small enclosed rooms at the end of the chamber. One for chamber attendants and the other for broadcasting announcers and technicians.

Other features: The table at the centre of the chamber houses a number of other interesting features including the Mace and despatch boxes.

Who sits where?

House of Representatives seats are arranged in a U-shape, with the Speaker sitting on the Speaker's Chair at the top of the room. Members of the government sit on the right of the Speaker and the opposition sit on the left. Leaders sit at a central table in front of ministers and shadow ministers who sit on the front bench on their respective sides. Other members sit on the backbenches including smaller parties and/or independent members. Parliamentary officers and officials sit towards the top of the chamber with the exception of the Serjeant-at-Arms who sits towards the back.

House composition

The House of Representatives of the 42nd Parliament comprises 150 members—each one representing one of Australia’s 150 electorates. Members are elected for three years, but may serve longer if, following a federal election, the member retains his or her seat in the Parliament. To check out all the current members of the House of Representatives go to Information about Members of the 42nd Parliament <http://www.aph.gov.au/house/members/index.htm>

A parliamentary party is a political party with at least one member elected to the Parliament of Australia. The party works together to form the government, opposition or a minor party. All members of the current House of Representatives belong to a party except three who are known as Independents. The composition of the current House of Representatives is described in the tables below. To find out more about all the political parties registered in Australia go to Political Parties and Organisations <http://www.aph.gov.au/library/intguide/pol/polparti.htm>

	Political Party	Numbers	Total

Except during January and July, members of parliament usually meet for two consecutive weeks throughout the year—this is known as a parliamentary sitting. During a sitting week, the House of Representatives conducts business from Monday to Friday, but on occasions may have late night sittings or even over the weekend. To find out if the House of Representatives is sitting this week go to Scheduled Sittings for 2010 <http://www.aph.gov.au/house/info/sittings>

There are a number of things that take place in the House of Representatives on a sitting day. They include:

- proposed laws, known as bills, are debated and voted on (sometimes amendments are made to the proposed laws)
- issues of national importance are discussed
- votes, including divisions, are taken on matters before the House
- questions are asked of the Prime Minister and ministers during the period known as Question Time
- statements are made about issues relevant to members' constituents and electorates
- inquiries are initiated (or referred) to parliamentary committees
- reports and other documents are presented.
